BLACK POLITICAL PARTICIPATION

1984, also catalyzed grass roots activism at colleges and in cities throughout the country.

In recent years, there have been the congressional overrides of President Reagan's veto of sanctions and a rise of divestiture of South African-related holdings by government pension funds and university endowments. Several major corporations left South Africa in 1986 and 1987, partly because city governments have responded to lobbying by refusing to do business with firms that have a presence in South Africa. This exodus may accelerate as a result of the federal budget package passed in late 1987, which increased taxes on American corporate subsidiaries remaining in South Africa. The influence of black Congressman Charles Rangel of the Ways and Means Committee in the House-Senate budget conference was a crucial factor in securing the adoption of this measure. However, some observers believe that the anti-apartheid campaign is beginning to suffer from the "lack of a popular post-sanctions agenda" (Jackson, 1987:32) and the dissipation of the movement's base of college students, clergy, and trade unions following the rapid initial victories on divestiture and imposition of sanctions.

Antipoverty Policy

Blacks have been stalwart members of a broad-based coalition to alleviate poverty through redistributive policies since the Great Depression. The federal government began to address the problems of poverty during the New Deal period and greatly expanded its activity in this sphere during the Great Society of the Kennedy-Johnson years (1961-1968). Today, there remains considerable controversy over the nature of this commitment as well as its scope.

Poverty is not merely an economic problem, but also a political problem related to the distribution of society's goods and resources by the public and private sectors. Given the widespread American belief in free enterprise, the private sector is expected to be the primary creator of jobs. Blacks advocated full employment as being preferable to relief during the New Deal, and recently that tradition was reflected in black support for the Humphrey-Hawkins bill mandating a federal full-employment policy (an ineffectual version of which became law in 1977; Hamilton and Hamilton [1986]).

In reviewing the public dialogue over antipoverty policy since the early 1960s, there is a striking continuity in the terms of the political debate. Three major problems have been continually addressed: structural unemployment (that is long-term job loss due to the disappearance of job categories, in contrast to the fluctuations of the business cycle); the inadequacy of public schooling; and the fear of creating poverty dependency or a permanent welfare class.

Four major kinds of social spending programs have been designed to alleviate poverty: social insurance, such as Social Security and Medicare; means-tested cash assistance, such as Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC); means-tested in-kind benefits, such as food stamps; and hu-
